“Śrī Caitanya-caritāmṛta”

Madhya-līlā

Chapter 2

A Brief Account of the Antya-līlā: The Ravings of Love’s Madness

(English translation from the Bengali, following the Gauḍīya Maṭha edition and the «Anubhāṣya», 2026 — draft)

1 “In this chapter, as I set out in brief the Lord’s final pastimes, I describe Gaura’s raving (pralāpa) and His other states in separation from Kṛṣṇa.”[1]

2 Glory, glory to Śrī Caitanya! Glory to Nityānanda! Glory to Advaitacandra! Glory to all the devotees of Gaura!

3 Through the last twelve years that remained to Him, the Lord felt His separation from Kṛṣṇa without cease.

4 Night and day the Lord was in the very state of Śrī Rādhikā when She met Uddhava.

5 The Lord was constantly in the divine madness of separation: He always acted as one bewildered, and all His speech was raving.[2]

6 Blood oozed from His pores, and all His teeth shook. At one moment His body grew thin, at another it swelled.

7 Inside the Gambhīrā He did not sleep a moment at night. He rubbed His face and head against the wall, and they were covered with wounds.[3]

8 Though the three doors were bolted, the Lord would go outside. Sometimes He fell at the Lion Gate, sometimes into the waters of the sea.

9 The Caṭaka hill seemed to Him to be Govardhana, and He ran towards it, weeping and crying out in anguish.[4]

10 The groves and gardens He took for Vṛndāvana; He would go there to dance and sing, and at times He fell unconscious.

11 Transformations of feeling never heard of anywhere showed themselves in the Lord's body.

12 All the joints of His arms and legs came apart by a span; they left their sockets, and only the skin held them in place.[5]

13 His hands, feet and head all withdrew into His body, and the Lord was seen in the form of a tortoise.

14 So wondrous were the feelings that showed themselves in His body. His heart felt empty, and all His words were lament and despair:

15 "Where is the Lord of My life, with the flute at His lips? What shall I do? Where shall I find the son of the king of Vraja?

16 To whom can I speak? Who knows My sorrow? Without the son of the king of Vraja My heart is breaking."

17 Thus He lamented, bewildered at heart, and constantly recited verses from Rāmānanda Rāya's drama:

18 (Śrī Rādhā laments:) "This Hari does not know the pains we suffer when love is broken; nor does love know where it should and should not strike; nor does even Madana know how weak we are. No one knows another's sorrow in full; our very life is not in our control, and this youth lasts only two or three days. Alas, alas, O Creator, what is to become of us?" (Jagannātha-vallabha-nāṭaka, 3.9)[6]

19 "In My heart the sprout of love came up, but a flood of sorrow broke it, and Kṛṣṇa pays it no heed. Outwardly He is the king of lovers, but within He does the work of a cheat, intent on killing other men's wives.[7]

20 O friend, I do not understand the Creator's ordinance. I loved for the sake of happiness, but everything turned out the opposite. Now life is leaving Me; it will not stay.

21 Love is crooked and senseless: it does not know where it should strike and where not, nor can it tell good from bad. With the rope of that cruel cheat's qualities it has bound My hands and neck, and I cannot get free.[8]

22 That bodiless Madana, so skilled in harming others, constantly fixes his five arrows to the bow. He has pierced the body of a helpless woman through and through: he gives her pain but does not take her life.

23 What sorrow lies in another's heart, no one else knows: this verdict of scripture is true. Why speak of others? Even My friend, dear to Me as life, does not know it, for she only tells Me to be patient.

24 'Kṛṣṇa is an ocean of mercy; some day He will accept You' — friend, these words of yours are empty. A living being's life is as unsteady as water on a lotus leaf: who will live long enough?

25 You say without thinking that a living being's life lasts a hundred years. But the wealth of a woman's youth, on which Kṛṣṇa sets His mind, lasts only a few short days.

26 As fire shows its charming light, draws the moth and kills it, so Kṛṣṇa shows His qualities and steals the heart, and then casts it into an ocean of sorrow."

27 Lamenting so much in His dejection, Śrī Gaurahari opened the door of His sorrow. Tossed by the mighty waves of feeling, His mind turned this way and that, and He recited another verse:

28 "Without serving Śrī Kṛṣṇa's form and all else that is His, My days and all My senses are utterly useless. Alas, how can I, shameless, go on bearing these senses, burdens of stone and dry wood?[9]

29 That moon-like face is the abode of the nectar of His flute song and the birthplace of the nectar of beauty. What use are the eyes of one who does not see it? Let a thunderbolt fall on his head! Why do such eyes remain?[10]

30 O friend, hear Me: My fortune is struck down. My body, heart and mind, and all My senses — without Kṛṣṇa all are fruitless.

31 Kṛṣṇa's sweet words are a river of nectar. Know that the ears they do not enter are like the hole in a broken cowrie shell: their birth was in vain.

32 The nectar of Kṛṣṇa's lips, and Kṛṣṇa's qualities and deeds, surpass in taste the very essence of nectar. Why did one who does not know their taste not die at birth? That tongue is like a frog's tongue.

33 The fragrance of Kṛṣṇa's body steals the pride even of the scent born from mingling musk and the blue lotus. The nose that has no connection with that fragrance is like a bellows.

34 The palms of Kṛṣṇa's hands and the soles of His feet are cooler than millions of moons, and their touch is like a touchstone. Let one who has not known that touch go to ruin: I know his body is like iron."[11]

35 Lamenting so much, the Lord, Śrī Śacīnandana, laid open the grief of His heart. In humility, despondency and dejection, His heart exhausted, He recited another verse:

36 “When by good fortune Madhu’s enemy came within our sight, our mind was stolen by that wretched Madana. When He comes again into our sight even for a moment, we shall stud all the ghaṭikās of that time with jewels.” (Jagannātha-vallabha-nāṭaka, 3.11)

37 “Whenever I saw Him with the flute at His lips, even in a dream, two enemies came at once — Bliss and Madana. They stole My mind, and I could not see Him to My eyes’ content.

38 If some moment ever again grants Me the sight of Kṛṣṇa, then I shall adorn all those ghaṭīs, kṣaṇas and palas with garlands and sandal paste and many jewelled ornaments.”

39 In a moment His mind came to external consciousness, and seeing two persons before Him, He asked them: “Am I not Caitanya? What did I see, as though in a dream? What did I say in My raving? Did you hear any words of misery?[12]

40 Hear Me, friend of My life: I have no wealth of love for Kṛṣṇa. My life is poor, and My body and senses are all useless.”

41 Again He said: “Alas, alas! Hear, Svarūpa and Rāmarāya, what My heart is sure of. Having heard it, consider and tell Me truly whether it is so or not.” Saying this, He uttered a verse:

42 “Love free of deceit does not exist in the human world. If it exists, how can anyone be separated? And if separation comes, who can live?”[13]

43 “Love for Kṛṣṇa without deceit is like the gold of the Jāmbū river: such love does not exist in the human world. If one is joined with it, there is no separation; and if separation comes, no one lives.”

44 Having said this, the son of Śacī recited a wondrous verse, and the two listened with one mind: “I feel ashamed to tell what is in My heart, yet I will speak, casting shame aside:[14]

45 There is not even a slight trace of love for Hari in Me. I weep only to display how great My good fortune is. Without seeing the face of Him who plays the flute, I sustain in vain this insect-like life of Mine.[15]

46 Far from Me is even the scent of pure love; I do not have even a bond of feigned love at Kṛṣṇa’s feet. If I weep, I do it to display My good fortune — know this for certain.

47 Without seeing that moon-like face, in which lies the joy of the flute’s sound, I have no support (ālambana) for My life; still I love My own body. This is simply the way of kāma, desire for oneself: I maintain this insect of a life.[16]

48 Love for Kṛṣṇa is spotless, like the pure water of the Ganges; that love is an ocean of nectar. In that spotless attachment (anurāga) no other stain can hide, just as a drop of ink cannot hide on white cloth.[17]

49 Pure love is an ocean of joy; if one gets a single drop of it, that drop drowns the world. It is not fit to be told, yet the madman speaks — and when it is told, who believes it?”

50 In this way, day after day, He revealed His feelings to Svarūpa and Rāmānanda. Outwardly there was the burning of poison, but within was bliss: such is the wondrous nature of love for Kṛṣṇa.

51 Tasting this love is like chewing hot sugarcane: the mouth burns, yet one cannot give it up. Only he in whose heart that love lives knows its power — poison and nectar meeting in one.

52 “O beautiful one, when love for Nanda’s son awakens in someone’s heart, its pains drive out the pride that fresh kālakūṭa poison takes in its sting, and its outpouring of joys humbles the boast of nectar in its sweetness. Its crooked and sweet powers are clearly known to that person alone.” (Vidagdha-mādhava, 2.18)[18]

53 When He saw Jagannātha with Śrī Balarāma and Subhadrā, He thought: “I have come to Kurukṣetra! My life has borne fruit: I have seen the lotus-eyed One, and My body, mind and eyes are soothed.”

54 Standing near Garuḍa, He took darśana of the Lord. What can I say of that bliss? At the base of the Garuḍa pillar there was a low channel in the floor, and it filled with His tears.[19]

55 Returning home from there, He would sit on the ground and write on the earth with His nails: “Alas, where is Vṛndāvana? Where is the son of the king of the cowherds? Where is He with the flute at His lips?

56 Where is that stance, bending in three places? Where is that song of the flute? Where is that bank of the Yamunā? Where is that play of the rāsa? Where are the dancing, the singing and the laughter? Where is My Lord, Madana-mohana?”

57 Many feelings surged up in turmoil, and His mind grew anxious; He could not endure a single moment. In the fierce fire of separation His composure tottered, and He began to recite various verses:

58 “O Hari, O friend of the helpless, O sole ocean of compassion! Alas, alas, how shall I pass these unfortunate days and nights without seeing

You?" (Kṛṣṇa-karṇāmṛta, 41)[20]

59 "Without seeing You, these nights and days are unfortunate; this time will not pass. You are the friend of the helpless, a boundless ocean of compassion: be merciful and let Me see You."

60 Restless feeling arose and His mind grew unsteady; the course of such feeling cannot be understood. His mind burned from not seeing Kṛṣṇa, and He asked Kṛṣṇa Himself how He might see Him:

61 "O flute-player, know that Your boyish charm and My restlessness are wonders of the three worlds, known only to You and Me. What then shall I do to gaze on Your charming lotus face with My own eyes, when We are alone?" (Kṛṣṇa-karṇāmṛta, 32)[21]

62 "The power of Your sweetness, and My restlessness because of it — these two only You and I know. What shall I do? Where shall I go? Where can I go to find You? Tell Me this Yourself!"

63 Under the force of many feelings they met and mingled (sandhi and śābalya), and feeling fought feeling in a great battle. Eagerness, restlessness, humility, anger, indignation and others were the soldiers, and the madness of love was the cause of it all.[22]

64 His feelings were maddened elephants and the Lord's body a field of sugarcane: in the elephants' battle the field was trampled. Divine madness came upon the Lord, His body and mind were exhausted, and, absorbed in His feelings, He cried out:[23]

65 "O God, O Beloved, O sole Friend of the world! O Kṛṣṇa, O Fickle One, O sole Ocean of compassion! O Lord, O Lover, O Delight of the eyes! Alas, alas, when will You again come before My eyes?" (Kṛṣṇa-karṇāmṛta, 40)[24]

66 The signs of madness made Kṛṣṇa appear before Him, and, absorbed in feeling, He was seized by loving pique (praṇaya-māna). His words turned mocking, sulky and proud, with praise in the guise of blame: now He censured, now He honoured.[25]

67 "You are God (deva), absorbed in play: with all the women of the world You play as You like. You are My Beloved (dayita): so sit within My heart, since by My good fortune You have come.

68 You attract all the women of the world and satisfy them all. You are Kṛṣṇa, the stealer of hearts — what a rogue! Who would ever honour You?

69 Your mind is fickle; it never stays in one place — but that is no fault of Yours. You are an ocean of compassion, the friend of My life; I am never angry with You.

70 You are the Lord (nātha), the life of Vraja; You protect Vraja, and with so many tasks You have no leisure. You are My Lover (ramaṇa); You come to give Me happiness — this is the play of Your cleverness.

71 Taking My words as censure, Kṛṣṇa has left Me, I know. Hear these words of praise: You are the delight of My eyes, My wealth and My life. Alas, show Yourself to Me again!"

72 Stupor, trembling, perspiration, pallor, tears and a faltering voice appeared, and His body was covered with bristling hair. He laughed, wept, danced and sang; rising, He ran here and there, and at times fell unconscious to the ground.

73 In His swoon He met Kṛṣṇa face to face. Rising, He gave a loud roar and said: "Here He has come, the Great One!" Kṛṣṇa's sweetness and qualities filled His mind with many bewildered fancies, and by reciting a verse He made sure of what He saw:

74 “Is this the god of love himself? Is it an orb of sweet radiance? Is it sweetness itself, nectar for the mind and eyes? Is it the One who loosens the braids, the beloved of My life? It is Kṛṣṇa who rises before My eyes!” (Kṛṣṇa-karṇāmṛta, 68)[26]

75 “Is this Kāma in person, an orb of radiance embodied? Is it sweetness itself in bodily form? Is it a feast for My mind and eyes? Is it the beloved of My life? Truly Kṛṣṇa, the joy of My eyes, has come!”

76 His many feelings were the guru, His body and mind the disciple, and in endless ways the guru made the disciple dance. Despondency, dejection, humility, restlessness, joy, composure and anger — in this dance the Lord’s time passed.[27]

77 With Svarūpa and Rāmānanda, Mahāprabhu night and day sang and heard the songs of Caṇḍīdāsa and Vidyāpati, Rāya’s drama, the Karṇāmṛta and the Śrī Gīta-govinda in supreme bliss.[28]

78 Purī’s love was chiefly parental; Rāmānanda’s was pure friendship; Govinda and others had the rasa of pure servitude; and Gadādhara, Jagadānanda and Svarūpa knew the bliss of the chief rasa. By these four moods the Lord was held captive.[29]

79 Even in Līlāśuka, a mortal man, such feelings arose; what wonder, then, if they arose in the Lord? Moreover, the Great One has become the abode (āśraya) of the chief rasa, and so every feeling rises in Him.[30]

80 In His former pastimes in Vraja there were three things He longed for and could not taste, however He tried. Now, accepting the essence of Śrī Rādhā’s feeling, He tasted those three Himself.[31]

81 Tasting it Himself, He taught His devotees. The Lord is rich with the touchstone of love; without regard for who was worthy and who was not, He gave it to everyone. Mahāprabhu is the crest-jewel of givers.[32]

82 Of this ocean of secret moods Brahmā does not obtain a single drop, yet the Lord distributed such wealth throughout the world. There is no other avatāra so merciful, no other such giver; no one can describe His qualities.

83 This is not a matter to be told; if it is told, no one understands — so wonderful is Caitanya's play. Only he can understand it on whom Caitanya's mercy rests and who has the company of the servants of His servants.[33]

84 Svarūpa held in his treasury the jewel-like essence of Caitanya's pastimes, and he placed it in Raghunātha's throat. The little I heard from Raghunātha I have expanded here, and I give it to the devotees as a gift.[34]

85 If someone says, "The book is full of Sanskrit verses; ordinary people will not be able to understand it," I reply: I describe the Lord's conduct as it was; I cannot please everyone's heart.[35]

86 Nowhere here is there contradiction, and nowhere have I deferred to others' views: I describe the natural truth (sahaja vastu). For if the heart is bent by partiality, it becomes absorbed in that, and the natural truth can no longer be written.[36]

87 Even one who does not understand will, by hearing again and again how wonderful is Caitanya's life, come to love Kṛṣṇa and know the ways of rasa. Simply by hearing, great good comes.

88 The Bhāgavata is full of Sanskrit verses, and its commentaries are in Sanskrit, yet the three worlds understand it. Here there are only a few verses, explained in the vernacular — why should everyone not understand?

89 I have described something of the sūtras of the final pastimes, and my heart wishes to expand them. If some life remains to me and Mahāprabhu's mercy comes, I shall describe the rest of the pastimes in detail.

90 I am old and infirm; my hand trembles as I write, and my mind remembers nothing. My eyes do not see, my ears do not hear, yet I write — this is a great wonder.

91 Within the sūtras I have described something of this essence of the final pastimes, expanding it a little. If I die before I can describe it, these pastimes will remain the wealth of the devotees.

92 I have made these sūtras in brief; what I have not written here I shall consider later. If I live so long and Mahāprabhu's mercy comes, I shall expand it to my heart's content.

93 Devotees great and small, I worship the feet of you all; may you all be pleased with me. I write what Svarūpa Gosāñi held and what Rūpa and Raghunātha know; the fault is not mine.[37]

94 I hold on my head the feet of Śrī Caitanya, Nityānanda, Advaita and all the devotees. The dust of the holy feet of Svarūpa, Rūpa, Sanātana and Raghunātha I make the ornament of my head.

95 The Vaiṣṇavas of Vraja gave me the treasure of their command, and I bow to their chief, Haridāsa. The ocean of Caitanya's pastimes has a wave, the wave a drop; of that drop Kṛṣṇadāsa tells a particle.[38]

Notes

1. Anubhāṣya: the final pastimes are the Lord's life in sannyāsa; Gaura is the Lord who has taken on the feelings of the gopīs; pralāpa is the speech of madness born of separation from the Beloved. Heading in the edition: "The Lord's raving and other states in separation from Kṛṣṇa". ↩
2. Anubhāṣya: bewildered actions — udghūrṇā; raving speech — the ten kinds of mad speech, beginning with citra-jalpa. ↩
3. Amṛta-pravāha-bhāṣya: the Gambhīrā is the small inner room behind the veranda and the hall. ↩
4. Amṛta-pravāha-bhāṣya: the sand hills on the seashore are called caṭaka-parvatas; there is a large one between the Guṇḍicā temple and the sea, and Mahāprabhu often ran there, taking it for Govardhana. ↩
5. Anubhāṣya: the bones in the joints come apart, the skin alone stays in place, and the joint stretches to the length of a span (vitasti). ↩
6. Anubhāṣya: the pain is that of love broken off — Kṛṣṇa has broken the bond, and the gopīs are tormented by the sickness of separation; āśravam — "nothing but suffering", or "in another's power". Amṛta-pravāha-bhāṣya: another reading is vidhe ("O Creator!"). ↩
7. Amṛta-pravāha-bhāṣya: the sprout of love came up when She met Kṛṣṇa; in separation it was wounded, and now a stream of sorrow flows. Kṛṣṇa alone can heal it, yet He makes no effort to protect the sprout. ↩
8. Bengali guṇa means both "quality" and "rope". Amṛta-pravāha-bhāṣya: it is love itself that binds Rādhā with the rope of the qualities of that cruel cheat, Kṛṣṇa. ↩
9. Heading in the edition: "A song of despondency (nirveda) that reveals deep love for Kṛṣṇa"; the verse is called the words of the Gosvāmipāda (gosvāmi-pādokta-śloka). Anubhāṣya: shameless — because She still clings to this living body that does not taste Kṛṣṇa. ↩
10. For verses 29–34 the Anubhāṣya cites the Bhāgavatam (2.3.17–24): ears that do not hear of the Lord's deeds are empty holes; a tongue that does not sing of Him is a frog's tongue; one who has never smelt the tulasī from His feet is a corpse that breathes. Heading in the edition (29–34): without service to Kṛṣṇa the body and senses are fruitless — the futility of eyes, ears, tongue, nose and skin. ↩
11. The touchstone (sparśa-maṇi) turns iron into gold at a touch. ↩
12. Heading in the edition: "The Lord's mahābhāva — citra-jalpa; in outward consciousness He laments before Svarūpa and Rāmānanda". Amṛta-pravāha-bhāṣya: the two were Svarūpa Dāmodara and Rāya Rāmānanda; seeing them, the Lord came partly to outward consciousness, set aside the feeling that He was Rādhā, and asked, “Am I not that very Caitanya?” The Bengali caitanya also means “consciousness”: “Am I not conscious?” ↩

13. Heading in the edition: a Prakrit verse cited in the Vaiṣṇava-toṣaṇī on Bhāgavatam 10.31.1. Anubhāṣya: love without deceit — without the pretended religion of dharma, artha, kāma, mokṣa and the rest. ↩
14. Anubhāṣya: lāja-bīja khāñā (lit. “having eaten the seed of shame”) — casting off all shame. ↩
15. Heading in the edition: a verse of Śrī Mahāprabhu Himself (śrī-śrī-mahāprabhu-pādokta-śloka). Anubhāṣya: I weep — I shed tears of joy, as though I had prema, to display My great good fortune. ↩
16. Anubhāṣya: ālambana (support) is the meeting of the one served (viṣaya) and the servant (āśraya); the longing to see Kṛṣṇa’s face shows that this support is absent, and then life is kept up in vain, for the sake of kāma, desire for oneself. ↩
17. Anubhāṣya: the anurāga of pure love for Kṛṣṇa is like white cloth, and the absence of anurāga is like a drop of ink: against it, it shows at once. ↩
18. Anubhāṣya: these are the words of Paurṇamāsī to Nāndīmukhī. ↩
19. Anubhāṣya: the Garuḍa pillar stands before Śrī Jagannātha’s temple, at the far end of the jagamohana; behind it, in the floor, was a low channel, and it filled with the Lord’s tears of love. ↩
20. Anubhāṣya: the helpless are the gopīs, tormented by separation; Hari is He who steals their bodies, minds and words; the sole ocean of compassion — for no one but Kṛṣṇa has the wealth of sweetness and prema with which to pity them. ↩
21. Anubhāṣya: Your śaiśava and My cāpala (restlessness) are wondrous in all three worlds, and known to the two of Us alone; viralam — “in solitude”, or “seldom seen”. Amṛta-pravāha-bhāṣya: “the sweetness of Your śaiśava” (lit. “childhood”). ↩
22. Anubhāṣya (after the Bhakti-rasāmṛta-sindhu): sandhi is the joining of two feelings, alike or different; śābalya, their clash with one another; autsukya — eagerness, cāpalya — restlessness, dainya — humility, roṣa — anger, amarṣa — indignation. ↩
23. Amṛta-pravāha-bhāṣya: divyonmāda is a wondrous state of prema in the mohana phase of bhāva, resembling delusion. ↩
24. The names of this verse are explained in order in verses 67–71. Anubhāṣya: sole Friend of the world — sole guardian of the land of Vraja; Fickle One — He who acts as He pleases; Lover — He who gives joy to the gopīs. ↩

25. Amṛta-pravāha-bhāṣya: solluṇṭha — censure in words of praise. Anubhāṣya: praṇaya is love untouched even by the scent of reverent awe; māna is affection at its height which, to hide itself, outwardly takes on a contrary look. ↩
26. Anubhāṣya: the particle nu expresses conjecture — “can it be…?” ↩
27. Anubhāṣya: as a guru, keeping his pupils under strict discipline, teaches them the arts, so the feelings in Mahāprabhu’s heart became His guru and made His body and mind dance in many ways. ↩
28. Anubhāṣya: Rāya’s drama is the Jagannātha-vallabha-nāṭaka; the songs are verses from the works of Caṇḍīdāsa, Vidyāpati, Rāmānanda Rāya, Bilvamaṅgala and Jayadeva. ↩
29. Amṛta-pravāha-bhāṣya: Purī is Śrī Paramānanda Purī; the chief rasa is madhura-rasa. Anubhāṣya: in Vraja Paramānanda Purī is Uddhava, and Rāmānanda is Arjuna (or Viśākhā); through these four moods the Lord accepted their worship, their company and their service, and was bound to them. ↩
30. Amṛta-pravāha-bhāṣya: Līlāśuka is Śrī Bilvamaṅgala Gosvāmī, a brāhmaṇa of the South named Śilhaṇa Miśra; renouncing the world at the words of the courtesan Cintāmaṇi, he later received bhakti by the grace of Kṛṣṇa and the Vaiṣṇavas and wrote the Kṛṣṇa-karṇāmṛta; seeing his madness of love, people called him Līlāśuka. The chief rasa is madhura-rasa. ↩
31. Anubhāṣya: see Ādi 4.230 — the greatness of Śrī Rādhā’s love, His own sweetness that Her love tastes, and the happiness She feels in it. ↩
32. Amṛta-pravāha-bhāṣya: like an earthly cintāmaṇi, the cintāmaṇi of prema brings forth other cintāmaṇis and yet remains whole in the Lord’s treasury; and the devotees, from the cintāmaṇi the Lord gave them, spread countless millions of them through the world. ↩
33. Amṛta-pravāha-bhāṣya: ordinary people have no claim on this truth of feelings that follow Rādhā; told to the unworthy, it is distorted into the perverted moods of the sahajiyās, bāuls and the like. ↩
34. Amṛta-pravāha-bhāṣya: Svarūpa Gosvāmī set down the Lord’s last pastimes in the sūtras of his diary (kaḍacā) and placed them in the throat of Raghunātha dāsa Gosvāmī — had him learn them by heart; so the diary was never written as a separate book, and this Caitanya-caritāmṛta is its essence. ↩
35. Anubhāṣya: describing the Lord’s conduct as it was, the author does not seek the praise of the followers of various doctrines, and for fear of their censure he neither omits, adds, hides nor “corrects” anything. ↩

36. Amṛta-pravāha-bhāṣya: for the jīva the truth of rāga is natural (sahaja), the way of reasoning is not; if rāga is turned towards another doctrine or the conclusions of logic, one is absorbed in them and loses impartiality, and then the nature innate in the jīva cannot be described. Anubhāṣya: one who gains the direction of rāga will, absorbed in it, easily grasp these descriptions; the natural reality is lived by the followers of rāga and cannot be conveyed in writing. In another reading, rāga-dveṣa: one who has left the service of Kṛṣṇa and is held by attachment and aversion to other things cannot describe the love for Kṛṣṇa innate in the pure soul. ↩
37. Anubhāṣya: devotees great and small — those who know bhajana, those who practise it, and those initiated into the name of Kṛṣṇa. Fearing that a quarrelsome neophyte who fancies himself a rasika may think he writes of siddhānta out of learning and love of argument, the author says humbly that he has no independence: he writes only what he learnt from Śrī Rūpa, Raghunātha and Svarūpa Dāmodara, to whose feet he is sold. ↩
38. Haridāsa Paṇḍita, the servant of Govindadeva in Vṛndāvana, at whose request the book was written (Ādi 8.54–65, 72; Anubhāṣya: see Ādi 8.49–60). Heading in the edition (94–95): “Obeisance to the Pañca-tattva, the gurus and Haridāsa Paṇḍita”. ↩
