“Śrī Caitanya-caritāmṛta”

Antya-līlā

Chapter 10

Relishing the Devotees’ Offerings

(English translation from the Bengali, following the Gauḍīya Maṭha edition and the Anubhāṣya, 2026)

1 I worship Śrī Kṛṣṇa Caitanya, who bestows grace on His devotees and is pleased with whatever a devotee offers Him with faith.[1]

2 Glory, glory to Gauracandra! Glory to Nityānanda! Glory to Advaitacandra! Glory to all the devotees of Gaura![2]

3 The next year all the devotees set out in great joy for Nīlācala to see the Lord.

4 Foremost of all was Advaitācārya Gosāñi; with him came Ācāryaratna, Ācāryanidhi, Śrīvāsa and other blessed devotees.[3]

5 Although the Lord had ordered Him to remain in Gauḍa, Nityānanda, out of love, set out to see Him.

6 This is the sign of anurāga (deep, spontaneous love): it does not heed rules (vidhi). For the sake of His company it breaks His order.

7 So it was in the rāsa dance: He told the gopīs to go home, but they broke His order and stayed with Him.

8 Kṛṣṇa is pleased when His order is kept; but when it is broken out of love, His joy is nourished a millionfold.

9–11 Vāsudeva Datta, Murāri Gupta, Gaṅgādāsa, Śrīmān Sena, Śrīmān Paṇḍita, Akiñcana Kṛṣṇadāsa, Murāri, Garuḍa Paṇḍita, Buddhimanta Khān, Sañjaya Puruṣottama, Bhagavān Paṇḍita, Śuklāmbara, Nṛsiṁhānanda and all the others set out. Their names cannot all be written down.

12 The people of Kulīnagrāma and the residents of Khaṇḍa came and joined them, and Śivānanda Sena came, bringing everyone along.

13 Rāghava Paṇḍita set out with his jhālis (hampers), packed with all the things that Damayantī had prepared and given him.

14 There were many wonderful foods, offerings worthy of the Lord, enough for Him to partake of for a whole year.

15–16 There were mango kāśandi and the relishes called ginger and chili kāśandi, lime and ginger with mango buds, and other preparations; āmsi, āma-khaṇḍa, tailāmra (mango pickle in mustard oil) and āma-sattā; and dried śuktā (bitter greens), carefully ground into powder.[4]

17 Do not look down on it because it is only śuktā: the joy found in śuktā is not found even in pañcāmṛta.[5]

18 Mahāprabhu receives the feeling (bhāva-grāhī): it is the affection alone that He accepts. So the śuktā leaves and kāśandi gave Him great joy.[6]

19 Damayantī, in her affection, regarded the Lord as a human being (manuṣya-buddhi): “From heavy food, āma (indigestion) may sometimes form in His stomach.[7]

20 If He eats śuktā, that āma will be cured." Thinking of her affection, the Lord was delighted.

21 "Her beloved strung a garland himself and placed it on her breast in the presence of her rivals; and though it was soiled with water, the full-bosomed maiden did not cast it off — for virtues dwell in love, not in the thing itself." (Kirātārjunīya, 8.20)[8]

22 She ground coriander and anise seeds into powder, cooked it in sugar syrup and shaped it into nāḍus (sweet balls).

23 She tied up dry ginger with sugar, nāḍus, and remedies for āma and bile, each separately in little cloth bags.[9]

24 There were dried kul berries (koli-śuṇṭhi), kul powder and kul with sugar — how many names shall I list? — and a hundred kinds of pickles (ācāra).

25 Coconut sweets and gaṅgājali nāḍus (white sweet balls) — she made every kind of sugar sweet that would keep a long time.

26 There were also long-lasting kṣīrasāra (thickened cream), maṇḍā and other milk sweets, amṛta-karpūra and many more besides.

27 From śālikācaṭi paddy she made sun-dried (ātapa) flat rice and filled big bags of new cloth with it.

28 Some of the flat rice she made into huḍum (puffed rice) and fried it in ghee; then, adding camphor and other spices, she made nāḍus of it in sugar syrup.

29–30 She fried grains of śāli rice and ground them to powder, moistened the powder with ghee and cooked it with sugar syrup. Then, adding powdered camphor, black pepper, cloves, cardamom and rasavāsa (aromatic spice), she made most fragrant nāḍus.

31 Again, she fried khai (popped rice) of śāli paddy in ghee and made ukhḍā in sugar syrup, adding camphor and other spices.[10]

32 She ground phuṭkalāi (fried peas) to powder and fried it in ghee, and with sugar syrup and camphor made nāḍus of it.

33 There were a thousand kinds of such foods, whose names I could not tell in this lifetime.

34 Rāghava gave the orders, and Damayantī carried them out. Both had deep affection and supreme devotion for the Lord.

35 She brought clay from the Gaṅgā, strained it through cloth, mixed in fragrant substances and made it into pāṁc-kuḍi (thin wafers).[11]

36 She filled thin clay pots with sandalwood paste and other things, and packed everything else in little cloth bags.[12]

37 She made jhālis twice the size of ordinary ones and neatly filled them all.

38 She tied up the jhālis and carefully sealed them. Three porters carried them, taking turns.

39 I have briefly described these jhālis, which became famous as “Rāghava’s jhālis.”

40 Makaradhvaja Kara was the munsib (steward) of the jhālis; he guarded them vigilantly, as if they were his very life.[13]

41 In this way all the Vaiṣṇavas came to Nīlācala. As providence would have it, that day was Jagannātha's water pastime.

42 On the waters of Narendra Lake, Śrī Govinda boarded a boat and sported in the water with all the devotees.[14]

43 At that time Mahāprabhu came joyfully to Narendra with His devotees to watch the water play.

44 At that very time all the devotees of Gauḍa met the Lord at Narendra.

45 The devotees came and fell at the Lord's feet, and the Lord raised them all and embraced them.

46 The whole Gauḍīya party sang kīrtana, and on meeting the Lord they wept with love.

47 Water sports, music, singing, dancing and kīrtana — a great tumult on the shore and play in the water.

48 The Gauḍīyas' saṅkīrtana and their weeping mingled, and the sound of that great tumult filled the universe.

49 The Lord entered the water with all the devotees and sported with them all in delight.

50 Vṛndāvana dāsa has described these water sports of the Lord at length in his Caitanya-maṅgala (the Caitanya-bhāgavata).[15]

51 If I describe them here again, it will be repetition — useless writing that only makes my book longer.

52 After the water pastime Govinda returned to His abode, and the Lord went to the temple with His associates.

53 After seeing Jagannātha, He returned to His residence, had prasāda brought and fed the devotees.

54 For some time He talked with them all of Kṛṣṇa (iṣṭa-goṣṭhī), and then sent everyone to the lodgings each had occupied before.

55 Rāghava handed the jhālis over to Govinda, and they were kept in a corner of the dining room.

56 Govinda emptied the previous year's jhālis and took them to another room, keeping them there to be filled with provisions.

57 The next day Mahāprabhu went with His associates to see Jagannātha at His rising from bed.

58 There He began the beḍā-saṅkīrtana (the kīrtana around the temple), and seven parties began to sing.

59 In the seven parties seven persons danced: Advaita Ācārya and Prabhu Nityānanda, 60 Vakreśvara, Acyutānanda, Śrīvāsa Paṇḍita, Satyarāja Khān and Narahari dāsa.

61 The Lord moved among the seven parties, and each one thought, "The Lord is in my party."[16]

62 The tumult of the saṅkīrtana pierced the sky, and all the residents of Jagannātha's town came to see.

63 The king came with his retinue and watched from a distance, and all the queens watched from the upper storey of the palace.

64 In the ecstasy of the kīrtana the earth trembled. The people called out "Hari!" and there was a great tumult.[17]

65 For some time He led the kīrtana in this way; then the Lord wished to dance Himself.

66 On seven sides the seven parties sang and played, and in the middle Gaura Rāya danced, absorbed in great love.

67 A line of an Oḍiyā song came to Mahāprabhu's mind, and He told Svarūpa to sing it:

68 "Let my head be offered at the Jagamohana!"[18]

69 To this line He danced, absorbed in His own feeling, and all the people around floated in the Lord's love.[19]

70 Raising His holy arms, the Lord called, "Say it! Say it!" and the people, floating in bliss, called out "Hari!"

71 The Lord fell and lost consciousness; He was no longer breathing. Then suddenly He rose with a roar.

72 His hair bristled thickly, like the thorns of a śimula tree. At times His body swelled; at times it grew thin.

73 From every pore came perspiration and blood, and His faltering voice uttered only “jaja,” “gaga,” “pari,” “mumu.”

74 Each of His teeth shook on its own, so loosely that it seemed they would fall to the ground.

75 Moment by moment the Lord’s blissful ecstasy grew. The third prahara of the day came, and still the dance did not end.

76 The ocean of bliss surged in everyone, and all the people forgot body, self and home.

77 Then Nityānanda Prabhu devised a means: one by one He stopped all the singers.

78 Only the principal parties went on singing with Svarūpa, softly.

79 When the tumult died down, the Lord regained some outward awareness. Then Nityānanda told Him how tired everyone was.[20]

80 Knowing that the devotees were tired, He brought the kīrtana to an end, went with them all and bathed in the sea.

81 The Lord took prasāda with them all and then sent everyone off to rest.

82 He Himself lay down at the door of the Gambhīrā, and Govinda came to massage His feet.

83–84 It had always been a firm rule: when the Lord lay down after taking prasāda, Govinda would come and massage His feet, and after that go and eat the Lord’s remnants.

85 That day the Lord had lain down across the whole doorway. Unable to go inside, Govinda made a request:

86 “Please move to one side and let me go in.” The Lord said, “I have no strength to move My body.”

87 Again and again Govinda asked Him to move aside, but the Lord answered, “I cannot move.”

88 Govinda said, “I want to massage Your feet.” The Lord said, “Do it or not, as you like.”

89 Then Govinda spread his outer cloth (bahirvāsa) over Him, stepped over the Lord and went into the inner room.[21]

90 Govinda massaged His feet and pressed His waist and back, and under that gentle rubbing the Lord’s weariness went away.

91 The Lord fell happily asleep while Govinda pressed His body, and after some two daṇḍas (about forty-eight minutes) He woke.

92 Seeing Govinda, the Lord spoke angrily: “Why have you been sitting here so long today?

93 When I fell asleep, why didn’t you go to take prasāda?” Govinda said, “You lay in the doorway; there was no way out.”[22]

94 The Lord said, “Then how did you come inside? Why didn’t you go out the same way to take prasāda?”

95 Govinda said within himself, “For me, service is the rule. Let it be an offence; let me even go to hell.

96 For the sake of service I do not count even ten million offences, but for my own sake I fear even the shadow of an offence."[23]

97 Thinking all this, Govinda remained silent and gave no answer to what the Lord had asked.[24]

98 Every day, when the Lord slept, he would go to take prasāda; but that day, seeing the Lord so weary, he began to press His body.

99 And there was no way out: how could he leave? To step over the Lord is a great offence.

100 All this is the subtle heart of the scriptures of bhakti; one knows such principles only by Śrī Caitanya's mercy.[25]

101 The Lord delights in revealing His devotees' virtues, and it was to reveal them that He acted as He did.

102 Thus I have briefly told of this dance in a circle (parimuṇḍā-nṛtya), which Śrī Caitanya's servants sing of even today.[26]

103 In this way Mahāprabhu, with His own associates, washed and cleaned the Guṇḍicā temple.

104 As before, the Lord sang kīrtana and danced, and as before He enjoyed a picnic meal (vanya-bhojana) in the garden.

105 As before, He danced in front of the chariot and saw the Herā-pañcamī festival.

106 All the devotees stayed for the four months of the rains and saw Janmāṣṭamī and the other festivals.

107 Earlier, when the devotees had come from Gauḍa, every one of them wished to feed the Lord something.

108 Each would bring some prasāda and give it to Govinda, saying, “See that the Gosāñi eats this without fail.”

109 Some brought peḍā, some nāḍu, some cakes and sweet drinks — costly, fine prasāda of many kinds.[27]

110 Govinda would tell Him, “So-and-so has given this,” but the Lord would say, “Put it aside,” and would not eat.

111 As he kept putting things aside, one corner of the room filled up: food enough for a hundred people was stored there.

112 Everyone eagerly asked Govinda, “Did you have the Lord eat the prasāda I gave?”[28]

113 Govinda put them off, telling each one something. Then one day he spoke to the Lord in despair:[29]

114 “Advaita Ācārya and the other honoured devotees carefully give me things to feed You.

115 You do not eat them, and they ask again and again. How long can I put them off? How am I to be free of this?”

116 The Lord said, “Those who have long lived with Me — why should they feel sorrow? Bring it all here, whatever anyone has given.”[30]

117 Saying this, Mahāprabhu sat down to eat, and Govinda offered Him everything, naming each giver:

118 “These are from the Ācārya: coconut (paiḍa), juicy cakes of many kinds, amṛta-guṭikā balls, maṇḍā and a jar of camphor.[31]

119 These many kinds are from Śrīvāsa Paṇḍita: cakes, sweet drinks, amṛta-maṇḍā and sugar lotuses (padma-cini).

120 All these gifts are Ācāryaratna’s, and these many kinds are Ācāryanidhi’s.

121 These are from Vāsudeva Datta and Murāri Gupta, and these various kinds from Buddhimanta Khān.

122 Śrīmān Sena, Śrīmān Paṇḍita, Nandana Ācārya — please eat what they have given.

123 Look first at all these from Kulīnagrāma, and look at these, just as many, from the people of Khaṇḍa.”

124 So, naming every one, Govinda set the things before the Lord, and the Lord, well pleased, ate them all.

125–126 Though the coconuts with their tops cut open, the amṛta-guṭikās, the drinks and all the rest were a month old, everything tasted almost fresh. Nothing was stale or tasteless — such was the Lord’s grace.[32]

127 In a single daṇḍa the Lord ate food enough for a hundred people, and asked Govinda, “Is there anything more?”

128 Govinda said, “Only Rāghava’s jhālis are left.” The Lord said, “Let them stay today; I will look at them later.”

129 Another day, when the Lord ate in seclusion, He opened Rāghava’s jhālis and looked at everything.

130 He tasted a little of every item and, finding them delicious and fragrant, praised them highly.

131 The rest He kept in store for a whole year, and at mealtimes Svarūpa would take out a little and serve it.

132 Sometimes, at night too, Svarūpa would have Him partake of a little; for the Lord surely enjoys what a devotee gives with faith (śraddhā).[33]

133 Thus Mahāprabhu passed the Cāturmāsya with His devotees in the joy of talks about Kṛṣṇa.

134 From time to time Advaita Ācārya and others would invite Him, cooking rice and various vegetable dishes at home:

135 hot peppery dishes and sweet-and-sour ones, ginger, salt, lime, milk, yogurt and sugar candy (khaṇḍa-sāra);

136 two or four kinds of greens, a broth of śuktā (bitter greens), eggplant with nimba, and fried paṭola;

137 fried phula-baḍī and mung dal soup — they cooked various dishes to suit the Lord's taste.

138 They would also bring Jagannātha's prasāda to go with these. Sometimes the Lord went alone, sometimes with His associates.[34]

139 Ācāryaratna, Ācāryanidhi, Nandana, Rāghava, Śrīvāsa and all the other devotees who were brāhmaṇas —

140–141 these would invite Him in this way with great care. Vāsudeva, Gadādhara, Murāri Gupta, the people of Kulīnagrāma and of Khaṇḍa, and all the others would invite Him by bringing Jagannātha's prasāda.[35]

142 Now hear the story of Śivānanda Sena's invitation. Śivānanda's eldest son was named Caitanya dāsa.[36]

143 He brought the boy along to present him to the Lord, and when he did so, the Lord asked his name.

144 Hearing the name Caitanya dāsa, Gaurarāya said, "What name have you given him? I cannot make it out."[37]

145 Sena said, "I gave him the name I knew." With these words he invited Mahāprabhu.

146 He had costly prasāda of Jagannātha brought, and the Lord sat down to eat with the devotees.

147 Out of regard for Śivānanda the Lord ate, but His mind was not pleased by so heavy a meal.

148 Another day Caitanya dāsa invited Him, and, understanding the Lord's desire, brought dishes to suit it:[38]

149 yogurt, lime, ginger, phula-baḍā and salt. Seeing these things, the Lord was pleased at heart.

150 The Lord said, "This boy knows My mind. I am satisfied with his invitation."

151 Saying this, He ate rice with yogurt, and made Caitanya dāsa the recipient of His remnants.

152 In this way four months passed in invitations, and some Vaiṣṇavas could not get a day.

153 Gadādhara Paṇḍita and Sārvabhauma Bhaṭṭācārya had fixed days for feeding Him (bhikṣā).

154–155 Gopīnātha Ācārya, Jagadānanda, Kāśīśvara, Bhagavān, Rāmabhadra Ācārya, Śaṅkara and Vakreśvara would from time to time invite Him to rice cooked at home. When others invited Him, the prasāda cost two paṇas of cowries.

156 At first the fixed sum had been four paṇas of cowries, but out of fear of Rāmacandra Purī they made the invitations smaller.[39]

157 After they had stayed four months, He bade farewell to the devotees of Gauḍa, and His companions of Nīlācala remained with Him.

158 Thus I have told of the Lord's invitations to meals and of how He relished what His devotees offered.[40]

159 In the course of it I have also told of Rāghava's jhālis and of the dance in a circle (parimuṇḍā-nṛtya).[41]

160 Whoever hears the narrations of Śrī Caitanya with faith will surely attain love for His feet.

161 To hear them is like nectar; they soothe the ears and the mind. Fortunate is he who relishes them.

162 Praying at the feet of Śrī Rūpa and Śrī Raghunātha, I, Kṛṣṇadāsa, narrate the Caitanya-caritāmṛta.[42]

Notes

1. Anubhāṣya: yena kenāpi — with anything at all, even the simplest thing, if a devotee offers it with faith. ↩
2. The same verse as Madhya 4.2 (and Antya 3.2); translation as there. ↩
3. Anubhāṣya: Ācāryaratna is Candraśekhara; Ācāryanidhi is Puṇḍarīka Vidyānidhi, also called Premanidhi. ↩
4. Anubhāṣya: tailāmra is mango pickle kept in mustard oil. Amṛta-pravāha-bhāṣya: purāṇa śuktā — dried bitter jute greens. ↩
5. The Gauḍīya Maṭha edition reads śuktāya ye sukha haya, nahe pañcāmṛte; another reading is sukutāya ye sukha prabhura, tāhā nahe pañcāmṛte (“the Lord’s joy in sukutā is not found in pañcāmṛta”). ↩
6. Edition heading: the transcendental Bhagavān accepts the feeling. Anubhāṣya: bhāva here is a transcendental, causeless movement of the heart, made of pure goodness and aimed at pleasing Kṛṣṇa — not a mundane feeling that seeks its own pleasure. ↩
7. Anubhāṣya: to see Him as a human being (manuṣya-buddhi) is the consciousness of the residents of Gauḍa and Vraja: their hearts, made of pure goodness, know nothing of His majesty, and they know Gaura-Kṛṣṇa in His human form as won over by their pure love alone. Āma is an acid-bilious disorder that comes from indigestion. ↩
8. Edition heading: a verse from Bhāravi’s Kirātārjunīya (canto 8, verse 20); only what is offered with love is full of virtue, and in a gift of love outer faults and merits are not weighed. Anubhāṣya: only a thing offered with love has virtue; any other, even a good one, is without it — and love has no need to test the thing. ↩
9. The Gauḍīya Maṭha edition reads śuṇṭhī-khaṇḍa, nāḍu, āra āma-pitta-hara — three separate things. Amṛta-pravāha-bhāṣya: kuthalī — little bags. ↩
10. Amṛta-pravāha-bhāṣya: ukhḍā — the small husked grains, like khai, that remain after the large khai have been picked out. ↩
11. The Gauḍīya Maṭha edition reads pāṁc kuḍi; according to the Anubhāṣya, other readings are pākauḍi and pāṁpaḍi (thin wafers), or parpaṭī. ↩
12. The Gauḍīya Maṭha edition reads candanādi (“sandalwood and other things”); another reading is sandhānādi (“pickles and the like”). ↩
13. Anubhāṣya: munsib (Arabic munsif) — overseer, steward; Makaradhvaja Kara was a resident of Pāṇihāṭi, a devotee of Gaura and a follower of Rāghava Paṇḍita. ↩

14. Anubhāṣya (on verse 52): in the temple of Jagannātha resides Śrī Govindadeva, the vijaya-mūrti (the Deity who goes out in procession); it is He who goes to Narendra for the water pastimes. ↩
15. Caitanya-maṅgala was the first title of the Caitanya-bhāgavata. Amṛta-pravāha-bhāṣya: see Caitanya-bhāgavata, Antya, chapter 9. ↩
16. Edition heading: the Lord manifests His great majesty (aiśvarya). ↩
17. The Gauḍīya Maṭha edition reads kīrtana-āveśe (“in the ecstasy of kīrtana”); another reading, noted in the Anubhāṣya, is kīrtana-āṭope (“by the force of the kīrtana”). ↩
18. Anubhāṣya: the Jagamohana is the hall (nāṭya-mandira) of Śrī Jagannātha; pari — “to”, muṇḍā — “head”, yāu — “may it be offered”. Amṛta-pravāha-bhāṣya: the place in the Jagamohana where the devotees dance is called parimaṇḍala, and parimuṇḍā is the Oḍiyā corruption of that word; the line is not given in full, so its sense is not clear — it only points to some special feeling. ↩
19. The Gauḍīya Maṭha edition reads āpana-āveśe (“absorbed in His own feeling”); another reading is parama-āveśe (“in great absorption”). ↩
20. Edition heading: the Lord comes to a half-external state (ardha-bāhya). ↩
21. Bahirvāsa, the outer cloth: the Anubhāṣya (heading to this verse) says that Govinda places his own bahirvāsa on the Lord’s body and steps over Him. ↩
22. The Gauḍīya Maṭha edition reads prasāda laite (“to take prasāda”); another reading is prasāda khāite (“to eat prasāda”). Edition heading: the Lord tests whether Govinda is intent on pure service. ↩
23. Edition heading (to verses 95–96): the one aim of a servant of Gaura-Kṛṣṇa is the wish to please His senses; serving for His pleasure, the pure devotee abhors even a drop of desire to please his own senses and fears offence in it. ↩
24. Edition heading: Govinda sees in the mahā-prasāda the spiritual reality itself and the Lord’s own possession; yet honouring it concerns himself, and, wary of any wish to please his own senses, he waits until the Lord wakes. Anubhāṣya: compare Ādi 4.201. ↩
25. Anubhāṣya: those attached to karma do not grasp this subtle heart and take mere rites for bhakti; bhakti is that by which service to Bhagavān is done. ↩
26. The Anubhāṣya and the Amṛta-pravāha-bhāṣya gloss parimuṇḍā-nṛtya as a dance in a circle (parimaṇḍala-nṛtya); on the parimaṇḍala, the place in the jagamohana where the devotees dance, see the note to verse 68. ↩
27. Peḍā, a sweet of thickened milk; the Anubhāṣya records the variant paiḍa (coconut, as in verse 118). ↩

28. Edition heading: the devotees ask Govinda whether the Lord has eaten what each of them offered. ↩
29. Edition heading: with evasive words Govinda consoles the givers. ↩
30. Ādivasyā, “old residents”: those who have long lived with the Lord (Amṛta-pravāha-bhāṣya: they have no cause for sorrow, for the delicacies were brought by those who have just come from Gauḍa). The Anubhāṣya heads the verse “The Lord asks why the devotees are sorrowful” and records other senses given to the word: “unfortunate,” “foolish,” “fickle-minded,” “overeager” (ā-dekhlā, kāṅlā). ↩
31. Amṛta-pravāha-bhāṣya: paiḍa (an Utkala word) — coconut. Anubhāṣya: pūpī — a cake; kūpī — a vessel for keeping camphor. ↩
32. Mukutā nārikela, coconuts with the top cut open (Amṛta-pravāha-bhāṣya). ↩
33. The Gauḍīya Maṭha edition reads karāya upayoga (“has Him partake”): Svarūpa serves the Lord; another reading is karena upayoga (“He partakes”). Edition heading: the Lord accepts what a devotee offers with faith. ↩
34. Edition heading: the Lord partakes of the offerings together with prasāda. ↩
35. Gadādhara Paṇḍita is named separately in verse 153. Anubhāṣya (on verse 141): the people of Kulīnagrāma are Satyarāja Khān, Rāmānanda Vasu and others; the people of Khaṇḍa are Mukunda dāsa, Narahari dāsa, Raghunandana and others. Anubhāṣya (on verse 156): in the homes of brāhmaṇas by birth the Lord accepted the food they had cooked; at the invitation of others He accepted mahā-prasāda worth two or four paṇas of cowries. ↩
36. Anubhāṣya: Caitanya dāsa wrote a Sanskrit commentary on the Kṛṣṇa-karṇāmṛta; some say he is also the author of the mahākāvya Caitanya-caritāmṛta. ↩
37. Edition heading: hearing a name that speaks of service to Him, the Lord hides Himself and pretends not to understand. ↩
38. Edition heading: understanding the Lord’s wish, Caitanya dāsa, son of Śivānanda, serves Him of his own accord with foods that rekindle a weakened digestive fire. ↩
39. Edition heading: out of fear of Rāmacandra Purī the meal is halved. On Rāmacandra Purī, see Antya 8. ↩
40. The words of this verse (bhakta-datta … āsvādana) give the chapter its title in the colophon of the edition. ↩
41. See verse 102 and the note to verse 68. ↩
42. The same colophon verse as Antya 2.172; translation as there. ↩